It's About Perspective

When I was younger, if someone told me that I couldn't understand something because I'd never experienced it, I would get mad. I'd become indignant. I'm smart. I can understand things.

Over time I've come to realize that I was wrong. It's not about smart. It's about perspective.

Someone who has been in the military, someone who grew up in the city, someone who has worked in a busy emergency room or on a factory floor, they simply have seen and experienced things that I haven't. They'll understand things from a different point of view.

This diversity, this varied perspective, is so important as we look for solutions to today's complex problems. If we want to find solutions that work for everyone, not just for those who hold power, then we need to include diverse points of view.

A Case for Term Limits

We need to change the balance of power in Washington, away from politicians and back towards to people. To that end, I propose Congressional term limits.

Term limits would make it harder for career politicians to accumulate personal power. Personal power accumulated by a legislator gives their district more of a voice in Congress than another district. Term limits would create more equal representation across districts.

Term limits would provide more opportunities for more diverse representation by breaking down the power of incumbency and creating a more level playing field.

We need more diverse representation in Congress.
